1. The Institute of Radio Technology and Communications, which was directed by Professor Stransky, has been transferred from Prague to Brno. With its entire staff, it has become part of the Military Technical Academy in Brno.
2. The Institute of Energetics is being further developed in Prague as part of the general reorganization of engineering training, which is now being divided into mechanical engineering and energetics.
3. All technical institutes have been instructed to check their personnel and to submit statements indicating how work would be reorganized if one or more members of their staff were to be transferred to the Army. These statements were to be submitted by October 1952.
4. All technical institutes are to be closed to the public, and both students and members of the staff will have to show identity cards on entering the building. The official reason given is that a number of these institutes are to be made part of the military establishment.
